Commentary:

The Fund has produced 31 consecutive positively monthly returns.

The fortunes of the global markets remain linked to the Trump Administration's trade policy. With tariffs expected to be enforced come the 6th of July, markets are expected to move towards a risk reduction strategy.

The desire to enforce tariffs has been met with fierce opposition from China, Europe, and NAFTA. The resulting situation has caused confusion for investors because it is extremely difficult to model the effects of an increase in tariffs and especially so when all the details have yet to be released.

The confusion has led to increased volatility as reflected in the Vix index, treasuries rallying, and the yield curve flattening to levels last seen in 2007.

The resulting flat yield curve is causing consternation for bond investors as they grapple with increasing Fed fund rates and rallying long end securities as concerns mount over the U.S. economy. Corporate bond indices in the U.S. continue to underperform, however, much of this underperformance is not entirely due to credit spreads widening, but rather due to the effect of duration. These indices will underperform further should bond yields increase from current levels.

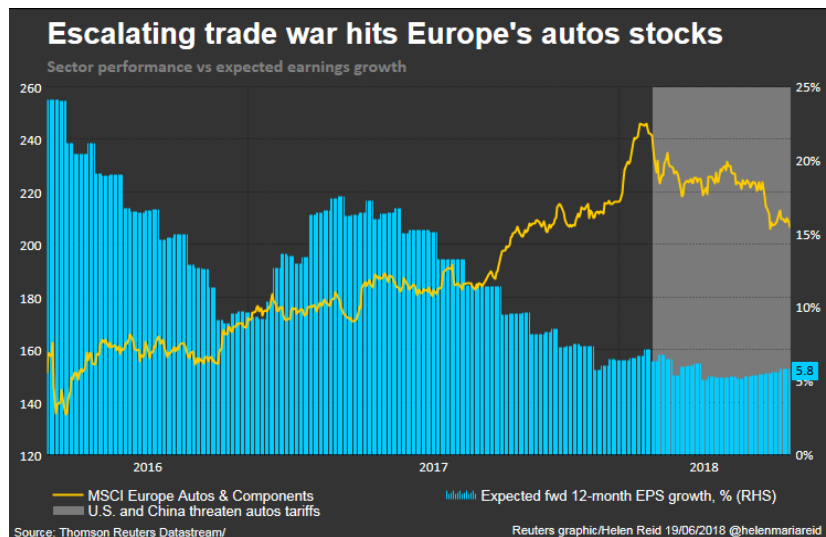

Looking ahead it is expected that the U.S. economy will hold steady and because of the tax cuts we should see around 2.5% to 3% GDP growth over the year. This sluggish economy combined with increasing treasury issuance as a result of the economy not exceeding 3% growth, also means that the budget deficit may continue to increase. A widening deficit under normal conditions would see bond yields rise. Meanwhile, corporate profits in the second half of 2018 are expected to shrink.

The economic data out of China and Europe also points to slowing growth and this slowdown could also impact global growth. We have seen that impact recently with slowing manufacturing numbers in Germany and China. Mexico and Canada are also showing signs of slowing economies. The slowing growth is expected to impact equities through lower expected EPS.

Slowing global growth hurts Australian commodity exports and this may be exacerbated by the potentially slowing economy in China. Currently, slowing of the housing market is of concern to the RBA and most likely one of the reasons Australia's central bank has not raised rates and is not expected to anytime soon. Housing has fallen over the year. The Aussie dollar is reflecting a slowing global growth story and the Australian dollar has now fallen back to 74 cents against the USD.

Credit spreads have also widened over the month and this widening has been significant in percentage terms given where spreads have recently been. The widening of credit spreads is expected to continue partly because of increased issuance and rising bond yields causing borrowing costs to rise. The ECB is also expected to wind down its QE programme in September, thus removing a significant buyer of bonds and a steadying hand for bond markets.

The outlook for Australian securities is rather cloudy. Future performance will one way or the other be impacted by any increase in tariffs by the U.S. Tariffs in the U.S. are expected to be levied on the
